The Military versus the Politician—Another False Dichotomy

The struggle for power and influence in international relations often leads to a false dichotomy between the military and the political. This binary oversimplifies the complexity of global politics, both in the United States and elsewhere. The military, often seen as the guardian of national security, is frequently portrayed as being at odds with the political leadership. However, in reality, the military and the political spheres are intertwined, and the distinction is often blurred.

The military, through its influence on national security policies, can shape the political landscape. Conversely, political leaders can use their power to influence military strategies and decisions. This interplay is evident in the history of the United States and other nations, where military leaders have had significant influence on policy decisions.

The false dichotomy between the military and the political is not only a simplification but also a misrepresentation of the reality. It overlooks the fact that both institutions are interconnected and that effective governance requires a balance between military and political considerations.

In the Cold War era, the military often took on a prominent role, particularly in the United States, where the military-industrial complex had significant influence. This was especially true during the Vietnam War, where public opinion and political considerations played a crucial role in the decision-making process.

In recent years, with the rise of non-traditional threats such as cyber warfare and terrorism, the military's role has expanded. This has led to a renewed focus on the military's role in national security and foreign policy, highlighting the need for a nuanced understanding of the relationship between the military and the political.

The false dichotomy is not only a misrepresentation but also a barrier to effective governance. It is important to recognize the interdependence of the military and political spheres and to work towards a more collaborative approach to national security and foreign policy.
The broader aspect of this new foreign policy is to become involved in a more active role in the international arena. This involves not only the furnishing of arms and equipment to friendly governments but also providing military advice and training. The United States has a responsibility to help nations in the struggle against communism, and it is through this policy that we can contribute our share to the maintenance of world peace.

Leadership and discipline are the key elements in any military operation. Without these qualities, the best-equipped army in the world will be ineffective. The armed forces must be well trained and well disciplined. The leadership must be strong and capable, and the discipline must be strict. The troops must be confident in their ability to carry out the orders given to them.

The lack of professionalism in the armed forces is a serious problem. Too often, the soldiers are treated as second-class citizens. They are not given the same respect and consideration as the civilians they are supposed to protect. This must change, if we are to have a professional army.

Logistics: Guns, bullets, and discipline—of look the American expressions such as "guns, bullets, and discipline" are not enough. What is needed is a well-organized and efficient system for supplying the troops with the necessary equipment and ammunition.

Camps—m兵t and training centers for the armed forces—must be well supplied with all the necessary items. This includes food, clothing, medical supplies, and other necessities. The logistics system must be able to function under any conditions, and it must be able to deliver supplies to the front lines quickly.

The United States has a responsibility to ensure that the armed forces are well equipped and properly trained. This is not just a matter of national defense, but also of national pride. The world looks to the United States as a model of how a democracy should function. If we cannot provide for our own defense, how can we hope to help others?

The armed forces must be prepared to meet any challenge that comes their way. This requires a strong military and a strong leadership. The United States has the resources to provide for its own defense, and it has the responsibility to do so. The armed forces must be ready to do their job, and they must be ready to fight.

Foreign Policy in El Salvador: A Frontline Story

According to sources close to the Reagan administration, key officials in the U.S. embassy in El Salvador, led by Charge d'Affaires John Cetress, are pushing for a military solution to the internal conflict in El Salvador. The administration has also been advised by advisors on a negotiated rather than a military solution. This internal discussion has not reached the higher levels of decision-making, but has been discussed at a lower level by the embassy staff.
